Tempest Cody, rancher, rides over to the Blain home, where she finds Nancy, an old schoolmate, sobbing her heart out because the man she trusted has left her to face the consequences. Nancy's father, a puritanical Scot, overhears the story and storms at his daughter and threatens to turn her out of the house. Tempest takes Nancy back with her to the ranch.

She finds a letter from Nancy addressed to Jack Prescott at a city address and deduces that Prescott is the man. Tempest says nothing to Nancy, but goes to the Prescott home. She forces her way into the house at the point of the gun and finds Prescott in his study, but the police, summoned by the frightened butler, arrive and throw her out of the house.

Tempest determines to waylay Prescott.

She trails his auto when he goes off to play golf, and, hiding in a clump of trees on the golf course, ropes Prescott and makes a prisoner of him. She forces him at the point of a gun to mount her horse and together they ride back to Tempest's ranch.

Here she confronts Prescott with Nancy, only to find she has got the wrong man. Prescott's valet, who has been courting Nancy and using his master's name to masquerade under, arrives in search of Nancy, willing to do the square thing by her.

He and Nancy are married, and Tempest Cody is left to apologize to Prescott. We are left with a feeling that the apology will lead to something more intimate in the near future.
